New Bedford Historical Society, Whaling National Historical Park, and Whaling Museum New Bedford, MA

Frederick Douglass arrived in New Bedford a fugitive from slavery. He departed three years later, in 1841, a self-made man on the cusp of oratorical fame. His time in this cobblestoned town coincided with the peak of its whaling fortunes, and Cunningham says most people “are just not aware” of Black mariners’ role in the early American economy, nor of the Quakers and free people of color who made New Bedford a popular terminus on the Underground Railroad. Separately and in collaboration, New Bedford Historical Society, New Bedford Whaling National Historical Park, and New Bedford Whaling Museum strive to bring this history to the fore.

In New Bedford, Massachusetts, you don't have to look far beyond the famed local maritime history to find signs of the city's rich Black heritage, including this celebration of area jazz musicians by mural artist Kat Knutsen.
